In a time long ago, when the planet Mars was inhabited, a carpenter named Geppetto lived in a small workshop. He crafted a wooden puppet to keep him company in his solitude. To his surprise, the creature came to life and began to walk. Overjoyed, the old man adopted him as his son, named him Pinocchio, and even sold his own coat to buy the boy's schoolbooks.

On his way to school, Pinocchio became enchanted by the music coming from a puppet theater. He sold his books to buy a ticket and went inside to watch the show. The theater owner, moved by the puppet’s story, gave him some gold coins to take to Geppetto, while warning him about the dangers of the outside world.

On his way home, Pinocchio caught the attention of a cunning fox and cat, who tricked him and stole his coins. When the Blue Fairy found him, the puppet tried to make up excuses about how he had lost the money. With every lie he told, his wooden nose grew longer and longer, revealing his dishonesty.

Full of regret, Pinocchio promised to be obedient, but he soon gave in to the temptation to travel to the Island of Games with other wayward boys. The place promised eternal fun, with no rules or studies. However, all that laziness and disobedience concealed a terrible curse that affected every child there.

After days of revelry, Pinocchio woke up to discover that a donkey’s ears and tail had sprouted on his body. The island’s curse transforms lazy boys into pack donkeys. He is sold to a circus to perform grueling labor, where he sustains injuries while attempting to jump through hoops and is eventually cast into the sea.

Upon falling into the ocean, the Fairy’s magic causes fish to eat away the donkey hide, restoring his original wooden form. Freed from the spell, Pinocchio swims through the depths, only to be swallowed by a gigantic shark that has been terrorizing local fishermen.

Inside the vast, dark belly of the sea monster, Pinocchio spots a light in the distance. To his surprise, he finds his father, Geppetto, who had been searching for him at sea for months. Using his wits, the puppet devises a plan to make the shark sneeze, allowing both of them to escape through the creature’s mouth.

Pinocchio carries his exhausted father to the shore and begins working honestly to provide for Geppetto. Moved by his sincere transformation, courage, and filial love, the Blue Fairy visits him in a dream. Upon waking, Pinocchio discovers that he is no longer made of wood—he has become a real boy of flesh and blood.
