While walking through an orchard under the afternoon sun, a very hungry fox spotted something delightful high up on a tall vine: a bunch of purple, glistening, juicy grapes—it looked like the perfect feast.

With its mouth watering, the animal took a few steps back, gathered momentum, and leaped with all its might. However, its front paws fell just a few centimeters short of the fruit, and it landed back on the ground.

Determined, the creature tried again. It moved even further back, ran fast, and took a great leap into the air. Once more, it missed the target by a hair's breadth and ended up stumbling onto the dusty path.

Not giving up easily, the fox used some stones for support and tried to climb the trunk of the vine. It stretched its body as far as it could, but the height was too great, and it ended up falling backward onto the grass.

Exhausted and quite frustrated at failing to reach the feast, the animal noticed that other creatures in the orchard were watching. Not wanting to appear defeated, it brushed the dust from its fur with an air of disdain.

Lifting its snout with an air of superiority, the fox turned its back and said loudly, "Those grapes are green and sour; they aren't even worth it." And with that, it went on its way, pretending it hadn't wanted them at all.
