Once upon a time, three little pig brothers decided to leave their mother's home to build lives of their own. Each went his own way, promising to build a safe and cozy home to live in.

The youngest pig, wanting to finish the task quickly so he could play, decided to build his house out of straw. The construction was finished in just a few hours, and he celebrated by singing happily through the forest.

The middle brother chose to build his house out of wood, which seemed sturdier than the straw one. He worked all day and, happy with the result, joined the youngest to play and rest.

The oldest pig, being very cautious, knew the forest held dangers. He spent days building a solid house of brick and cement, ignoring the teasing of his younger brothers.

One day, a big bad wolf appeared in the forest. He went to the straw house, knocked on the door, and—when the pig refused to open it—blew with such force that the house was blown away, sending the little pig fleeing.

The youngest pig ran to his brother's wooden house. The wolf followed, knocked on the door, and demanded entry. When he was ignored, he blew hard until the wooden planks collapsed, forcing both pigs to flee.

The two desperate brothers took refuge in the oldest brother's brick house. The wolf arrived in a rage and blew repeatedly, but the structure remained firm, not a single brick shifting out of place.

Frustrated, the wolf tried to enter through the chimney, but the pigs had a cauldron of hot water heating up. Burned, the villain fled, never to return, and the three celebrated their victory together.
